That the old government printing office building is a fire trap and is dangerous to life and property will be the substance of a report to Congress the coming winter upon expert testimony. For twenty years it has alternately been condemned, braced and patched up, and condemned again, and now the new building is in danger, it is said, from the liability of a serious fire affecting lives and the valuable machinery.

Jackson alley, along the north side of the new printing office, is stated to be but thirty feet wide, and a serious fire in the old structure would soon communicate to the large amount of paper in use on nearly every floor. It is understood the public printer will bring the matter to the attention of Congress in his report, and also mention the necessity for a suitable plant for the execution of photo-lithographing.

Millions of volumes of old government publications are stored in the old printing office, and although there would not be a great pecuniary loss if they were destroved, the superintendent of public documents has said he expects to collect much more than enough to pay for their distribution. The valuable library attached removed to the fireproof annex of the old building for further protection.
